The Awáswas Language

by William Shipley

In pre-conquest times, there were eight languages spoken along the Central California coast, stretching from the Carquinez Strait in the north to the the Salinas Valley in the south. These languages were related to one another about as closely as, say Spanish and Italian, which indicates that they were descended from a single mother tongue spoken less than two thousand years ago. This language family, formerly called "Costanoan," is now known as Ohlonean.

One of these languages, Awáswas, was spoken more or less in what is now western Santa Cruz County, specifically along the coast from somewhere north of present-day Davenport to about the present area of Rio del Mar. The speakers, who probably numbered less than a thousand, lived in small village communities, often called "tribelets," for which a few names have survived: "Soquel," "Aptos" and "Zayante" are examples. The language itself has long been extinct.

Fortunately, three scholars came to the area at various times between 1878 and 1888, specifically to salvage what they could of the Awáswas language. Among them, they recorded just over seven hundred words including some words which undoubtedly represent slightly different dialects.

The most skillful and experienced of the three men was a Frenchman, Alphonse Pinart (1852 - 1911) who travelled widely over the world collecting language material from hundreds of little-known languages. His were the earliest recordings, made in just a couple of days. On August 23rd, 1878, at Mission Santa Cruz, he consulted a woman named Eulogia and on August 26th, in Aptos, a man named Rústico.

The second visitor was Jeremiah Curtin (1835 - 1906), a well-known figure in late nineteenth-century Amerindian studies, who collected extensive material on several Native American languages, partly in association with the Bureau of American Ethnology. His wordlist was obtained in Santa Cruz in November, 1884. The name of his Awáswas consultant is unknown.

H. W. Henshaw (1850 - 1930) was the last of the three. He worked with an unknown consultant from September 26th to 29th, 1888. It is possible that the Awáswas speaker from whom he obtained his wordlist was either Felipe Gonzales of Watsonville or Lorenzo of Santa Cruz. Both of these men spoke the language. Henshaw was not primarily an anthropologist. Most of his scholarly work was ornithological. At any rate, his ability to hear and record speech sounds was not as good as the other two investigators. Of the three, Pinart was clearly the most talented.

By comparing the recordings of the three different men and by checking the work of later, much more sophisticated scholars with related Ohlonean languages, notably Mutsun (spoken around San Juan Bautista) and Rumsen (spoken in the Carmel Valley), it has been possible for me to get very close to what the sounds of Awáswas were actually like. The wordlist which follows has been rewritten based on such an investigation.

Every written consonant and vowel is pronounced. When consonants are doubled, both are pronounced, as in Italian. The "x" is pronounced like "ch" in German "Bach." The "t" stands for a "t" sound made with the tip of the tongue up in the roof of the mouth. Stress is on the first syllable unless otherwise marked.

The vowels are pronounced as follows:

"a" is like the "a" in "father." "e" is like the "e" in "met." "i" is like the "i" in "machine." "o" is like the "o" in "note." "u" is like the "oo" in "moon."
